In later times, we have seen that practice has entered into the school work, but at most it has followed the theory, not served as an introduction to it. Thus logic has been disassociated from practice. When theory, however, is approached inductively, opportunities are offered for practical logical work. We are so accustomed to use in geometry the term logic for deductive logic that we have almost forgotten that inductive logic has a place in teaching. From a series of concrete experiences, the pupil may be led, after the inductive method, to formulate some general principle. And the work can be made practical by employing the scale, the protractor, the compasses, and instruments for field work, not to mention the related numerical exercises. This inductive work forms a fitting propaedeutic to the ordinary high school course in geometry, and finds a fitting analogy in the history of geometry where the practical stage preceded the logical. Even after deductive geometry is begun, the inductive treatment could well be continued as a method of discovery. Practical field problems serve to point out the existence of certain theorems,...
